Profile

Ebun Sodipo

Using primarily collage and montage, the London-based artist looks to the future via history, both official and unofficial, where she seeks out a genealogy for black femme and trans lives.

Ebun Sodipo's assemblages are crammed with art-historical fragments, ancient and modern, placed next to low-resolution images from mass media. An 1867 etching of Édouard Manet's Olympia, 1863, an image of the snake woman from the anime film Ninja Scroll, 1993, heavy shrouds of smoke from an unseen source, a cannily cropped gay sex scene, an ancient bas-relief of two hands holding: these are some of the images the artist draws into two-dimensional communion and conflict.

It is the meme, however, that takes centre stage in Sodipo's work, a form that careens through timelines and phone chats, accruing and losing meaning, multiplying at high velocity before its eventual obsolescence. While it may seem absurd, when Tiffany Pollard, aka New York, one of reality TV's most compelling characters, appears in the photocollage the earth also moves, 2019, Sodipo summons not only her immediate expression but also a vast catalogue of her gestures that are diverse enough to make up an entire lexicon. The image of black femme expression – from its most impassive to its most ornate – has become something of a genre, a lingua franca to be learned, or a mask for all and sundry to wear.

If images of blackness appear in Sodipo's montages as fragments of numerous vernacular expressions and gestures, then the grid attempts to hold them together. While emblematic of colonial modernity, industrialisation and standardisation, for Sodipo the grid is less a constraint and more a tool to use and distort as required. In her work, images of varying sizes overlap, locked in a battle between chaos and order, repetition and difference. Sodipo disrupts her own intimations of the grid with irregularities, such as the tiny slivers of other images that appear when some layers slightly lift, owing to an interplay between the underlying adhesive and the resin poured on top. This gives the illusion of images floating above luminous metallic backdrops that vary in texture, from the smooth in This Much I Know, 2025, to the craggy in Infinite Economic Growth, 2025.

In Children of Goldie Williams, 2023, the artist pairs a contemporary image of actress Amanda Seales's sardonic upturned moue with a 19th-century mugshot of the scowling sex worker Goldie Williams. Both women wear comical yet defiant expressions: one in response to live on-air sexist remarks by self-styled bad boy dating expert Steve Santagati, the other as a defence against the carceral gaze. What Sodipo captures here is a rhyme, an affinity between these two black women separated by over a century.

It is in the annals of history, both institutional and unofficial, that the artist has sought a genealogy for black femme lives including those of trans women. For her first UK solo exhibition at CCA Goldsmiths, 'I Found Venus and She Was Transsexual' in 2022, Madeleine et Margo, 2022, combined two black women in a composite image: Madeleine, from Marie-Guillemine Benoist's Portrait of Madeleine, 1800 – identified simply as Portrait of a Negress until 2019 – and Margo, a trans sex worker with little recorded history.

Some historians have suggested that Madeleine, a slave-turned-servant from Guadeloupe, is painted in the guise of Marianne, goddess of liberty – the irony of which should not go unremarked. It's an idea supported by the colour and composition that brings to mind the French le tricolore, her classical garments and her portrayal as bare-breasted. The painting's history is a fascinating one: from its appearance at the Louvre's 1800 Salon, a 'black stain' in the words of one conservative critic, to a 2012 Spanish magazine cover in which Michelle Obama's face is superimposed onto Madeleine's body and, later, its inclusion in Beyoncé and Jay-Z's 2018 music video for 'Apushit', set in the Louvre. In contrast, Margo's historical footprint is faint: Sodipo discovered her image on a Tumblr page that archives trans women's representations in media.

For Sodipo, Tumblr has been more than a source from which to build her vast cache of images. Like many young black people who came of age in the early 2010s, the microblogging and social networking site offered an education in the heady world of black studies and schools of thought such as Afropeessimism. It was on Tumblr that Sodipo encountered the work of queer Kenyan scholar Keguro Macharia, the Jamaican philosopher, novelist and dramatist Sylvia Wynter, and black studies luminaries such as Tina Campt, Saidiya Hartman and Christina Sharpe – figures crucial to her intellectual formation.

Hartman's term 'critical fabulation', a redressing through storytelling and speculative methods of silences in historical records of enslaved lives – as proposed in her 2008 essay 'Venus in Two Acts' – has inspired many of Sodipo's recuperative archival forays. For example, a pair of 19th-century-style leather boots on a wooden plinth imagine those worn by the enslaved Ellen Craft as she escaped the American South by dressing as a white man, while a prosthetic leather vulva is 'a totem to Mary Jones', a trans sex worker and soldier in pre-civil war US who used a similar item – one among many technologies, in Sodipo's words, that have allowed trans women to define themselves.

It is Vitoria, an enslaved transgender woman in 16th-century Lisbon, who has become foundational to Sodipo's practice. A healer and sex worker before her imprisonment by the Portuguese Inquisition, she is the subject of Vitoria: Buraco and The Way Her Teeth Settled, both 2024, performances that revivify her story. Recently, Sodipo was invited to develop a performance in São Miguel in the archipelago of Portuguese Azores where Vitoria was first taken after her abduction from Benin. The new work will examine slavery's legacy on the Iberian Peninsula and how, in the wake of such terror and dispossession, Vitoria defied its constraints. As Sodipo tells me, Vitoria is a source of personal strength – someone whom the artist conjures to mind to get through the day.

For the installation General Partitions – Precursor [Vitoria] Arrangement, 2024, Sodipo fashioned a small ritual site in Vitoria's honour: an octagonal space enclosed in clear PVC strip curtains onto which images of trans women's and transfeminine people's left hands – all friends of the artist's – are printed. 'To enter the space,' the exhibition material reads, 'is to be touched by the hands of sisters, trans women, and trans femme people who have sustained my existence.' Inside, orange peels, stones, red ribbon, Nigerian honey and Agege bread – elements related to Vitoria's history – are placed on one of two low-lying, quadrant-shaped altars inspired by the Benin royal throne circle. Like the victuals and coral-red carpet, the colour of Beninese ceremonial beads, these altars ground the work in West African practices. The installation pulses with audio recordings of laughter, conversation, birdsong, wind and waves.

Beyond their dramaturgical function, the artist's textual experiments have sometimes been displayed as stand-alone works. In an excerpt from the poem 'Surface Aesthetics', 2020, displayed in a vitrine at inter.pblc in Copenhagen, Sodipo's interest in the sensuousness of ornamentation became apparent – words such as 'shimmer', 'glisten', 'glimmer' and 'glitter' sprawled across the page, like objects bobbing up and down on the ocean's surface. Her current solo exhibition, 'An Ominous Presence', at London's Soft Opening, also connects us to the mercurial, her spot-lit assemblages reflecting pools of light onto the gallery floor with watery luminosity, an effect also present in several of the performances in which Sodipo places herself against vast swathes of mylar.

For the art historian Krista A Thompson, 'shine' in black artists' work can be a device to impede unwanted intimacies; it deflects the gaze and renders interiorities impermeable. What forms of capture or fetishism are evaded by all that shine and shimmer in Sodipo's practice? In her video And The Seas Bring Forth New Lands, 2018, the sateen sheen of a silvery-pink CGI pearl call to mind the novelist John Cheever's 'sexual iridescence', his term for the indeterminacy of his attractions – or, better yet, the nacreous abundance in Shola von Reinhold's sumptuous debut novel Lote, not least the cover of its US edition. When Mathilda, the protagonist, first encounters Erskine Lily – a sybarite who holds court on histories of the rainbow and the queerness of iridescence, namely peacock feathers and Venus (the Sister of Pearls and Mother of Mother-of-Pearl) – the latter is described as dusted in fine pearlescence.

While Sodipo has made shine, allure, glamour, beauty and luxury central to her metier, she does so with a knowingness that torques our pleasures to reveal their cost, as in And The Seas Bring Forth New Lands, 2018, which includes a television news segment on cobalt and coltan mining in the Congo. Hers is not an encomium to blackness, transness or womanhood – the Borromean knot that is her identity – as positions of unalloyed virtue or victimhood. Sodipo refuses to plunk the tired notes from respectability's playbook, her moving-image works drip with villainy, soapy operatic drama and sex.

'All this cat and all this ass. Yeah, bitches can't get with the programme,' purrs one woman a few minutes into her video Nasty Girl (The Sharpest Girl in Town), 2023. She's a vision of cocksure, high-femme realness, dressed in a single-shouldered, single-legged leopard-print unitard, a lollipop in one hand and a white cup in the other as she hymns her own head-turning physique. 'Just like if you see a UFO in the sky, you gonna be like, "ahh I'm scared". That's how bitches be when they see me,' she declares, deftly capturing the heady mix of seduction and inscrutability, familiarity and alienness at the heart of Sodipo's project.

The artist's latest show An Ominous Presence explores the tension between desire, identity, and the act of image-making

For those who grew up online during the early 2010s, Tumblr was a site which became a space to rewrite the rules of photo archiving. A whole generation used it to collect, curate, and remix images that reflected personal and political awakenings and, in turn, find a way to make sense of the world.

For London-based artist Ebum Sodipo, Tumblr provided a space to find her original references. But prior to being a teenager online, Sodipo's creative journey began after relocating to the UK from Nigeria. At ten, she started writing stories, and eventually her fascination with drawing manga shed light on her artistic abilities. "One of my tutors saw me drawing and was like, 'Oh, you should do an art GCSE.'" But similar to many artists, the journey was not linear. After temporarily pursuing a trajectory in psychology, in sixth form she realised she holding people's lives in her hands was too heavy a responsibility. Art, however, allowed her to explore human complexity without the same burden.

British Journal of Photography, 2025

"I'd been on Tumblr since I think 2011, before I went to uni," she says to me over Zoom, reflecting on her past on the site. "I think in 2012 I really started collecting [images] with purpose, thinking about Black production, Black creative and cultural production online. I was thinking about how to archive these things." It was an era of digital consciousness-raising, where young Black creators and thinkers were finding each other, developing a shared visual language. "It was also a moment where a lot of Black people my age, a bit younger, a bit older, were also becoming kind of politically aware and awakening a Black political consciousness." The images they shared – mundane, poetic, urgent – became part of a collective aesthetic, a form of self-archiving.

"I was thinking a lot about grids at the time – grids as a way of thinking about human progress"

For Sodipo, images aren't passive, instead, they help structure desires, shape identities, and pull people toward them. "As I was transitioning, I was drawn to these images of femininity, but then there was a tension for me as an African woman thinking about how these images are like particular anti-Black images as well, and the denigration of Black femininity." This friction, between longing and critique, attraction and rejection, sits at the heart of her work. "I wanted to have that desire, that tension really palpable, and something that you can. I wanted to have these images that you physically want to touch."

An Ominous Presence is an invitation to linger in that tension, to feel it, to question it, to recognise its pull. "I make images to make people feel pleasure in some way, whether that's aesthetic pleasure or intellectual pleasure," Sodipo says. In doing so, she doesn't just archive a moment, she constructs a mythology, one that pulses with life, inviting us all to step inside.

In "An Ominous Presence", Eburn Sodipo presents her largest works to- date, with a suite of new collages centred around an interpretation of the gothic that offers a re-framing of both social and art history. Traversing ideas of horror, the end of the world, death, fear, mystery, mythology, ghostliness and the unknown, these unsettling new works extend the artist's exploration of the idea that the trans woman represents a threat of danger and destruction.

Arranging images across a reflective metallic surface and encasing them in a thick layer of clear resin, Sodipo immortalises the figures, phrases and scenes that she assembles. While the glimmer and shine of her materials offers an allegory for the aesthetic expressions of transformation, Sodipo deliberately obscures self-reflection and stacks her images to complicate their clarity, their translucency enabling their contents to merge and generate new meanings. With every image carefully selected and positioned, the works in An Ominous Presence seek to reimagine the way we conceive of the past, time and history through images.

Titling the exhibition after a collage that includes the phrase "I'm an ominous presence the shape of a girl", Sodipo prefigures an atmosphere of uneasiness among the works, a reverberating sense of foreboding that the trans woman presents in the world. Incorporating references from contemporary visual culture, architecture and history, "An Ominous Presence" borrows the visual language of gothicism and the ruin to posit that queerness could be capable of dismantling entrenched heteropatriarchal systems of belief.

Ebun Sodipo's solo exhibition An Ominous Presence is now open at Soft Opening (until 26 April). I first encountered Ebun on a gorgeous summer afternoon in Tuscany organised by MQBMBQ. Guests walked through the gates of Villa Lena, parasols in tow, and gathered around an open field where Ebun took centre stage and delivered a spoken-word piece. Her performance was assured and captivating. In this solo show, she borrows the visual language of the Gothic to posit that queerness may well be capable of dismantling entrenched heteropatriarchal belief systems.

Public Gallery presents HangTime, a solo exhibition by Taylor Simmons (until 29 March). Painting from reference images and "turning Black reality into Black mythology", Simmons's practice serves as a powerful reminder of how archives of cultural memory can shape our collective identity. His practice anthologises decades of creative Black subcultures, canonising their relevance in ways that challenge mainstream appropriation.

Down the road, Soft Opening welcomed us with open arms, cold beers and 'An Ominous Presence', an amazing show by Ebun Sodipo. A far cry from last Thirsty Thursday's eye surgery-inducing fluorescent lighting at Herald St, the lights at Soft Opening were switched off. Who can blame them? With the recent announcement of the TFL price increase this Sunday, every little helps. Save those pennies, Ms Marsh. Jokes aside, we were mesmerised by the show. The walls were adorned with illuminated collages featuring various appropriated online images, all laid delicately on a bed of glistening metal, reflecting water-like refractions across the concrete floor. Sodipo entombed the pieces in a thick layer of clear resin, immortalising the atmosphere of unease. The exhibition gave us shivers and reminded us of Arthur Jafa's Love is the message, the message is Death, in which he weaves together images of an apocalyptic sun – like the doomsday planet hurtling towards earth in Lars von Trier's Melancholia – between video snippets of Black American history. Both artists mine internet and pop culture – like Sodipo's use of a Jessica Lange 'There's not going to be infinite economic growth you stupid slut' meme and Jafa's footage of Beyonce's 7/11 music video – to remind us that the world keeps spinning against a backdrop of impending armageddon.

Nasty Girl Kills English Language

Start with the opening scene of Spike Lee's 1996 comedy Girl 6, in which an as yet no-name aspiring actress, portrayed by Teresa Randle (who had already achieved "it girl" status at the time of the film's release), sits down for a screen test in hopes of landing a starring role with an impatient Quentin Tarantino, played by himself. Tarantino, performing his real world celebrity persona, asks Randle, performing what we can imagine might have been her former self, to say some lines. She does; he's unenthusiastic. He then says something like, "Okay, cut to the chase: take your top off. It's needed for the role." No-name Randle pauses and replies, "What? My agent didn't say this is part of the gig." Tarantino, annoyed, whitemansplains that yes, it is part of the role. He "needs" to see her tits as a part of the business, and he has upwards of fifty other Black women outside that door aspiring to play the part. So, if she doesn't want to strip, she should stop wasting his time and find another profession.

Flash Art, 2025

No-name Randle's initial reply is one of insolence. She thought that she was in the room with Tarantino because she was good at her art. But then she acquiesces, as she needs this gig to pay rent, and so down both shoulders, slowly, she slides her blouse, as if it was cotton blended with slime. Tarantino, and we as viewers, observe her discomfort and her nudity for a few seconds before she exclaims, "I can't do this!" She pulls up her shirt and bursts out of the rehearsal room and through the crowd of, as Tarantino promised, about fifty other Black women with no name waiting to be SEEN.

What happens next — and for the rest of the film — is that this no-name actress decides the most efficient way to earn money at the least expense to her dignity is to become a phone sex operator rather than aspiring to the fine art of being a serious actress. Thus, under the tutelage of a savvy and bossy madam played by a very hot 1990s Jennifer Lewis (who today is many scrollers' favorite great-aunt on the internet for her original meme-song "I-don't-want-nobody FUCKIN-wit' meeeee / in-these-streets!"), no-name actress rebrands herself as the eponymous Girl 6.

This film is just one of the many citations that appear in Ebun Sodipo's Nasty Girl (The Sharpest in Town) (2023) and Nasty Girl 2 (The Beast) (2024), a duo of video works that collage together found footage that she has sourced from the far corners of Tumblr, one of the places where Black culture lives on the internet. Where and what is Black internet culture, exactly? A possible response: I can't tell you; you just had to be there. Another possible answer: the Black internet does not exist in a specificity of form or in the aesthetic of an image, but in the mechanisms of circulation through which the image travels. Meaning, Black internet perhaps does not exist in a stable format, but simply arises when (at least) one Black user transfers data to (at least) one other.

Sodipo also cites a clip from Girl 6 in Nasty Girl 1 (2022), in which one of the girls (Girl 75 in this instance) is on the phone, talking or rehearsing how to construct a compelling sexual fantasy for a listener who she hopes to keep on the line because the longer he listens, the more money he pays. Sodipo's video works could be interpreted as rehearsing or processing or trying to communicate this complex meeting point — call it an intersection — of three big problems for the single Black woman in a modern/postmodern metropolis. First, the compulsion to generate capital (I need this gig!). Second, the slimy fact of being viewed as a disposable object of desire by the dominant power structure that controls the remittance of that capital (Tarantino's impatience for an actress's discomfort). And third, a language problem — how to use your voice, and to whom you bother to speak your condition.

Girl 6 and Sodipo's Nasty Girl series, along with much of the Black feminist literature that Sodipo devours, articulates this intersection of dilemmas in a capitalist patriarchy where Black womens' presence is required for society to function, albeit as an object of resentment. What I have noticed in this literature that Sodipo reads, such as Saidiya Hartman's Wayward Lives, Beautiful Experiments (2019), is that Black women have tended to open possibilities for themselves through activating the mechanism that is also a site of the violence inflicted upon them: their own bodies. And in many cases, using the body to network language, by way of the voice, or in a more general sense the creation of text. So, the no-name actress generates her necessary capital, building a support structure for her survival, by speaking as a sex object on the phone. A phone which today has been replaced by the internet, where Sodipo, also an avid consumer of internet culture, is using her artwork to speak to and through the same dilemma that she herself is certainly deeply implicated within, as an emerging artist in an art world which, despite its representational acquiescences, remains tethered to the surpluses of global racialized capitalism. I do not bother to state this as a criticism, but as the simple fact of a condition.

In Sodipo's An Other Ending (2023), the voice is layered over a rolling barrage of disparate internet-quality images and speculates on what it would take to see the death of whiteness, and this voice links whiteness and capitalism as co-constituted. To paraphrase: perhaps whiteness will end when the last coal furnace breaks; perhaps it will end when great thinkers admit that violence against women is always eroticized; and perhaps it will end when the last English-speaking person dies. It is a seductive proposition to think that this language of the British, and of the international art world, could become extinct, obsolete, and no longer necessary. Sodipo returns often to these speculations of mythic proportions where the world as we know it breaks. In her film works, where she herself (as in Celeste – She of the Sea, 2023), her friends (Atlantic Cruises – A Rest Stop, 2021), and her favorite Tumblr meme girls appear, women come to the city hoping to live long enough to see the end of capitalism while at the same time knowing they will never survive if they don't have some money. Perhaps this is Sodipo's exposition on what a Nasty Girl actually is: one who confronts the metaphysical dilemma of compulsory participation in one of Europe's most insidious inventions—modernism—with the relentless unattachment of a phone sex worker. To survive the city, she becomes like a jellyfish, a gorgeous supple predator like the one who appears in Nasty Girl (The Sharpest Girl Town) out on the street, with her friend, exclaiming "WE SUCKIN' EVERYBODY'S DICK! WE TAKIN' EVERYBODY'S MAN!" Hers is a carefree, brash obscenity that respectable people tend to shy away from because they don't want to risk their status in the capitalist hierarchy. A Nasty Girl maybe does not see a risk as a risk at all, because what is the worst that could happen? The end of this order of things?

I told Sodipo that I find the figure of a Black woman artist in the international art world these days fascinating, given the discourse now circulating within it — particularly the increasing inclusion of Black studies in museums and galleries. Why would this be weird? Because a defining feature of Black study is an examination of the fallout of one of the biggest and most lasting violences on Black women—the transatlantic slave trade and the capital that Europe extracted from it—and a lot of this value is still, to this day, being held in the form of artworks. So how ironic is it that art can still also be seen as a liberatory mechanism by those who theorize oppression? How can art be a form that concretized the violence of capital, while at the same time serve as an opening for the possibility of joy, of creation, of ecstatic experience? Who would choose to be an artist in the midst of this metaphysical dilemma?

When I spoke with Sodipo, who is working across a variety of mediums besides video, also collage, installation, and performance, she located her investment in art not in any particular form or technical process but rather in a desire to communicate. Here, again, I find myself, through Sodipo, tapping into the network and noting how the transfer of information and text creates both community and possibility. Like I mentioned earlier in this text about theories of the Black feminine, I recognize in Sodipo's work, and also in her position as an artist making that work in this international art-world context, a compulsory position of needing to open a possibility for herself, and doing so by activating the mechanism that is also the site of the violence. I do not yet have language for why desire, seduction (Sucking everybody's dick! Taking everybody's man!), and obscenity is such a frictionless route to creating this opening, but if pressed to speak, I would, thanks to Sodipo, simply flick through the pile of Tumblr images she has assembled in the Nasty Girl series. These images, to Sodipo, are not Black because of the people represented inside the frames, but become Black through the transfer of these images from the computer of one person living inside the racial construction of Blackness to another person situated somewhere else inside that construction. A collaged network of situatedness. Because these situations are not fixed in place, and for that matter nor is the construction, the metaphysics of living in that condition of being would necessarily have to include openings and possibilities only if through the momentary accident of many disparate parts being in a state of motion simultaneously. And this lack of fixity, as Sodipo's Nasty Girls display, might be what makes it possible for the site of the violence — the process of extracting capital from an eroticized brutality — to also be a location where those withstanding that violence can experience joy. An obscene proposition, but this obscenity, I think, protects us from any misplaced optimism that the world — yes, even the art one — changes its logics of racial capitalism by increasing its inclusion of Black images.

Ebun Sodipo (1993, London) lives and works in London. Sodipo's interdisciplinary practice narrates her construction a Black trans-feminine self after slavery and colonialism. Through a process of fragmentation, collage, and fabulation, she devises softer, other-wise ways of imagining and speaking about the body, desire, archives, and the past. Recent solo exhibitions include: Soft Opening at Paul Soto, Los Angeles; inter.pblc, Copenhagen; never, London; V.O Curations, London; Vitrine, Basel; Goldsmiths CCA, London; and a space arts, Southampton. Her work has been included in group shows at CCA Derry-Londonderry; Hannah Barry Gallery, London; Hauser & Wirth Somerset; Southwark Park Galleries, Touring; Espacio Gallery, London; Philippa Reid, London; and FACT, Liverpool. Sodipo's solo show will be on view at Soft Opening, London from March 7, until April 26, 2025.

Eburn Sodipo is a London-based artist whose interdisciplinary practice encompasses performance, film, sculpture and collage. Her work narrates the construction of a Black trans-feminine self in the aftermath of slavery and colonialism, aiming to create narratives for Black trans people of the future. Guided by Black feminist study, Sodipo employs collage and fabulation methodologies to explore themes of identity, desire and the body. Her work has been exhibited at Hauser & Wirth Somerset (2024) and V.O Curations, London (2023). In February, she has a forthcoming solo show at Soft Opening, London.

The queer artists taking over Art Basel Miami Beach

It's no secret that Miami Beach is queer as folk. Aside from legendary gay bar Twist, Gianni Versace's mansion and the year-round display of speedo-clad himbos, this month the city is home to many new queer art exhibitions.

Welcome to the world's glitziest (and campest) art fair: Art Basel Miami Beach. Hot on the heels of Art Basel Paris, this year's Floridian outing promises a sizeable contingent of historical and contemporary queer art, spanning surrealist, non-binary artist Claude Cahun all the way through to radical trans collagist Eboni Sodiipo.

Of course, where there's an art fair, there'll be queer representation in 2024. In this spirit, Art Basel has put its Nova section to good use – here, emerging galleries focus on new work from up to three particular artists – spotlighting everyone from the Olly Shinder-modelling artist Michael Ho, to Tumblr heroine-turned-radical-art-DJ Juliana Huxtable, whose name you might recognise from Berghain or the cooler dance festival line-ups.

Ebun Sodipo, Soft Opening

After spending nine years of her childhood in Lagos and two in Abuja, artist Ebun Sodipo came to London in 2004. Her parents both worked, so her grandmother and cousins spent a lot of time caring for her, introducing the artist to bible stories and West African mythology.

“I suspect these stories influenced how I see history now: as stories and narratives disseminated by a particular power structure, concerned only sometimes with ‘fact,’” she explains. “My upbringing was very religious. Both my parents were leaders in the Redeemed Christian Church of God, and yet they combined this colonial way of seeing the world with some traditional religious practices, such as belief in babalawo [Yoruba healers] and witchcraft.”

Ebun’s practice – which spans collage, performance, installation and poetry – owes a lot to the syncretic nature of her family’s faith, which she applies to her own Black transness. In this vein, she takes inspiration from varied sources – be it Yoruba culture, old Naomi Campbell moments (I worry that you’ll work in an office, 2024) and even vlogs of hair-braiding clips (Illustrations for Libations, Attestations, Affirmations, 2020) – to give found imagery and phenomena new meanings. Her assemblages, pulled together with printed paper and mylar, sealed in epoxy resin, serve as what she calls, “survival strategies of the marginalised, particularly the uses of anger and memory”.

Having shown with some of London’s cutting-edge galleries, including Neven Gallery and VO Curations, Ebun recently took to LA for a solo show with Soft Opening. Throughout her work, she merges imagery from online – often social media – to build an archive for trans women of the future. Subtlety reigns supreme for Ebun, whose practice never gives itself away on first viewing.

“I think people expect a kind of [spectacle] with my work, and the work of POC people in general, that I deliberately avoid,” she says.

Galleries collaborate to showcase global talent at Art Basel Miami Beach

This year, eight galleries will host joint presentations. Four of them discuss the benefits of these temporary alliances

Most Art Basel booths are occupied by a single gallery, but collaborations enable surprising synergies and conversations. Four gallerists discuss their collaborative booths: Fabian Lang (Zurich) and Espacio Valverde (Madrid), who will show a joint presentation of Spanish artist Elena Alonso's large-scale wall panels, sculptures and paintings. Soft Opening and Emalin, both from London, will show bronze sculptures and mosaics by Russian artist Evgeny Antufiev and the work of Ebun Sodipo, a multidisciplinary artist in London who excavates visual material to probe possible trans futures.

Why did you decide to pursue a joint booth? I like that you're also answering these questions with one voice.

It's essential that the character of each gallery comes through distinctly, while a clarity of vision is maintained. As two galleries from the same city, it felt exciting for us to bring our programs together in a way we haven't yet had the opportunity to, considering our close physical proximity to each other in London and ways in which our approaches relate – an ethos of mutual support, attention to detail and commitment to supporting artists with utmost care.

Art Basel, 2024

Tell us a little bit about who and what you'll be showing.

Emalin's presentation of Evgeny Antufiev includes new vessels cast in bronze, encrusted with semiprecious stones, and mosaics that draw from ancient craft and stone setting techniques. Antufiev's laborious treatment and sourcing of materials leaves a tactile trace on the objects, like bronze caked with his fingerprints. In his critical engagement with mosaics, Antufiev explores the entanglements of imagined imperial aesthetics with Soviet identity-building and the violence of contemporary expansionism.

Soft Opening plans to present a group of wall-based assemblages by Ebum Sodipo. The images are made from an extensive visual archive of still and moving digital imagery sourced online. Building these into large-scale collages arranged across reflective Mylar, the artist then coats the works in a layer of clear resin and frames them in thick crystalline acrylic and mirror-backed boxes. Sodipo's compositions at once allow a restoration of neglected figures from the past and plot a trajectory for trans futures.

Antufiev and Sodipo might appear to have very divergent practices. Do they share more in common than meets the eye?

Both Antufiev and Sodipo mine material culture for alternative and critical histories of image-making, and in doing so, explore an archaeology of representation, narrative, nostalgia and adornment. Of course, while the practices are very distinct, when seen in relief, they will illuminate each other materially, conceptually and critically.

Meet the most exciting young artists in London right now

From specialising in massive sculptural installations and folklore-inspired canvases to textile collages... these are the creatives to watch

NANCY DURRANT @NANCYDURRANT
15 OCTOBER 2024

This month, London has been the focus of the art world as Frieze brought artists, collectors and punters flocking to Regent's Park. But what's new? Who are the young artists emerging into the capital's art scene, who we're backing to be big at Frieze in the future? We've rounded up some of the most exciting.

ELLIOTT MORGAN

Eburn Sodipo makes work “for black trans people of the future”. Guided by black feminist study, she uses sound, performance, text, installation, video, and sculpture to tell stories (her passion – she started writing a novel aged nine) about Black trans women’s presence and selves in the past, present and future. “My work is motivated by a desire to give to others, particularly Black trans kids, what I didn’t have growing up,” she says. She tries to fill in the gaps, excavate lives in a more considered, empathetic way than historical record allows.

Interview with Artist Ebum Sodipo

Can you provide a short one-paragraph introduction to your life and work?

I am a London-based multidisciplinary artist. With my work, I try to bring forth narratives of black trans women's lives, particularly our interior lives, across the past and present, all so that trans people, specifically black trans women, will be able to build their selves up in ways I and other women living now could not. I always say I make work for black trans people in the future. I write, recontextualise images, draw out figures from the archive, and produce sculptures from historical imagination.

When did you first know you wanted to become an artist?

When I realised making art came easier than anything to me, when I realised how much pleasure it gave me. I must have been about 16 or 17. Before that, I wanted to be a psychiatrist but I was encouraged to explore painting and drawing by an art teacher at the school a couple of years earlier and really enjoyed it. But it wasn't until sixth form that I really sat down and asked myself which path would be best for my heart and soul that I realized how much I loved the researching, questioning, and experimentation art-making allowed.

Can you name 3 people who have inspired/informed your artistic practice?

Sylvia Wynter, Saidiya Hartman, Martine Syme

How has your identity formed your work?

I've always been a curious person, prone to questioning, mistrustful of authority, and dissatisfied with most accounts of the world. I think growing up I really needed to know why violence was occurring and allowed to occur. I am a migrant, I moved to the UK when I was 11; I am queer, and I am black. These factors pushed me to do a lot of reading the moment I was able to about common sense, about how we ended up with the world that we have, how we've come to the identities that we either take up or have placed on us. My work comes out of all that reading and questioning.

What materials are you the most interested in working with?

I work across several mediums so it's not the easiest question to answer. I think I'm known for my performances and my collages. With my collages, I work with found still and moving images. My physical collages are made with paper, Mylar, and epoxy resin. So maybe... I'm interested a lot in the production of images, how they in turn produce emotions, narratives, and ideology and how they can be rejigged to tell stories about/of trans women. I also work with archival fragments or fragments of history, I build them into stories and images. I try to bring forth these accounts of black trans women into the world in diverse ways.

General Partition – Precursor [Vitoria] Arrangement (2024)

If you could own one work of art from any period, what would it be and why?

Probably anything depicting and/or made by black transwomen from before the 16th century. There are images and objects depicting Gala priestesses from the 25th Century BC in Ancient Mesopotamia, Galli priestesses from 2000 years in Greece, and Rome (there was a grave uncovered a decade or so ago in York, UK) so I'm sure somewhere there is a depiction of African persons we would now call trans but due to a combination of colonisation, historical theft, and virulent queerphobia those objects are nowhere to be found. Someone needs to go into the archives and find these objects!

Can you tell us about a past project/collaboration you are particularly proud of?

I am most proud of my ongoing research project into the life of the enslaved African trans woman, healer and sex worker Vitoria. She lived in 16th century Azores and Lisbon and was kidnapped from Benin in modern-day Nigeria. She attracted the attention of the Portuguese Inquisition, who sentenced her to perpetual imprisonment as a rower on the King of Portugal's galleys. In her trial, she stated that there were women where she had lived who had bodies like hers, gesturing to an alternative gender system and way of relating to the body.

The outcomes of this project have included a theatrical performance Vitoria: Buraco, which premiered in Dublin in April 2024 as part of the LIVE Collision Festival. Developed using the transcripts from her trial, and scholarship on her life, the performance centres on my relationship to this archive and what it means to find Vitoria. Taking place between Benin, Lisbon, my bath, dream space and the hole in the sky, the story of Vitoria was told in a non-linear narrative using monologue, movement and sound.

I also created an installation, 'General Partition: Precursor [Vitoria] Arrangement' at Hannah Barry Gallery. This work was an enclosed octagonal space separated from the 'world' by PVC strip curtains, which had the left hands of different transwomen and trans-feminine people in my left printed on the surface. In this space were two altars, abstracted from the altar at the Oba's palace in Benin. One emitted sounds that Vitoria might have heard or made whilst in Lisbon, the other held items that were mentioned in the court trial: orange peels, bread and honey, a red ribbon, and stones.

Can you tell us about your upcoming projects/direction you'd like your work to take?

I'd love to produce another film, perhaps feature-length, about Vitoria, or maybe another black trans figure from deep history. And I also want to begin producing works that speculate on the future of black transwomen.

Inside the Exhibition Spotlighting Britain's Artists of Tomorrow

As an ambitious group show of British art opens at Hauser & Wirth Somerset, five artists – Victoria Cantons, Joseph Yaeger, Ebum Sodipo, George Rouy, and Sang Woo Kim – unpack their work

What does the zeitgeist of British art look like at the moment? A bold, eclectic new group show at Hauser & Wirth Somerset, Present Tense, aims to answer this question, showcasing the work of 23 artists both emerging and mid-career. With a mix of sculpture, painting, drawing, collage, video, and installation, there's much to take in: fresh from his ICA solo show at the end of last year, there's the uncanny, colourful sculptures of Gray Wielebinski; glitchy, tumultuous compositions by George Rouy; sensual collages by Ebum Sodipo, vast, cinema-inspired painting by Joseph Yaeger; a series of hallucinatory pigment dye transfers by Sang Woo Kim depicting glowing figures in nature; and much more.

Although there's a fair amount of sculpture in the show, painting reigns supreme here, ranging from the abstract, angsty canvases of Daisy Parris, all the way to the figurative, confrontational work of Victoria Cantons, which deals with the artist's lived experience as a transgender woman (Parris's work draws obvious parallels to Tracey Emin, and Cantons to Jenny Saville – two titans of British art). As a contemporary survey of emerging British artists, in theory, the 'next' Emin and Saville are in this Hauser & Wirth show, too.

Speaking a few days after the opening, Isabella Bornholt, the show's curator, says she's noticed a real return to skill and craft in the art of recent years. "All the artists in the show have real conceptual gravitas to their works, but they also execute it with a skill," she says, "which I think is very much indicative of what's happening in the art world right now." Another key theme that emerged, she believes, is self-reflection. "In a world where we consume so much imagery and information on a day-to-day basis via our phones and our laptops, it's a really new, hyperactive way to live," she says. "And so many of these artists are looking inwards and self-reflecting to pose and answer questions."

As a mega-gallery with locations in London, New York, Paris, Zurich, LA, Hong Kong and more, Present Tense offers an exciting opportunity for younger artists to show at Hauser & Wirth – none of whom are currently on their roster – and a refreshing chance to show outside of London, where most of the UK's art-world action usually takes place. Located in the picturesque town of Bruton, which boasts top-quality restaurants and hotels (Rochelle Canteen's Margot Henderson does the food at The Three Horseshoes, a 17th-century pub opened by Phoebe Philo's husband, Max Wigram, last year), a weekend trip down to Somerset to see the show is well worth the journey.

Below, five artists featured in the show – Victoria Cantons, Joseph Yaeger, Ebun Sodipo, George Rouy, and Sang Woo Kim – talk in their own words about their work.

"I pull the images for my collages from this archive I've been building since 2014. From 2014 – 2018, I would go on Tumblr for a certain amount of time every day, and I would collect anything that was posted by a Black person that came across my feed. I basically grew up online. Tumblr kind of determined what it meant for me to be Black. It informed my politics when I was younger, and it's a place where I found myself, so that context is really important.

"These collages are about trying to describe a particular emotion, thought or desire that I have. I also like to think about the ways that we use these images and the Internet to communicate with each other, and to determine who and what we are through this relationship that is mediated by images. These images impact you in a way that you can't describe. It's like pre-thought; you don't really think about them, you feel them.

"Water, the sea, and the Atlantic is a really important aspect of my practice. I started making this work thinking about what it means to be Black, and part of that has to do with the Atlantic, or now, in contemporary times, the Mediterranean and the Gulf. I am thinking about what happens when a body moves from Africa into a non-African space via the sea, and the kind of transformations that happen. The psychological phenomenon of looking at the shifting feel of light and water, the kind of meditative states that it can get into, is really interesting to me. There's a theory that one of the reasons why we are drawn to shiny and glittering surfaces is because they remind us of water on a deep instinctual, lizard-brain kind of level. Our body is trying to quench a thirst that has been with us for a very long time, but you can never actually quench the thirst, and the desire is deeply embedded in your body in your DNA. That suddenly becomes a metaphor for thinking about transness and transfemininity, and this desire to move the body or to follow the desire to a certain point. That's why I use the motif of water and reflective surfaces in shine and shimmer, to get your attention and draw you in."

Frieze, 2021

The duo have been curatorial fellows at Cubitt Artists since January 2020, presenting No Real Closure, a platform for experimentation and development of black artistic practice across exhibitions, moving image, text, performance and public programming.

Their LIVE programme extends this method of inquiry, and will be available to view online, with performances by Ebun Sodipo, Rebecca Bellantoni & Ashley Holmes.

The performance programme will be hosted online on frieze.com from Thursday 14 October.

In her work visual and performing artist Ebum Sodipo takes us into her world of freedom and self-expression. Sodipo delves into the intricacies of her journey into confidence. She explores the fluid cosmological joy of being true to yourself. With themes surrounding gender, race and sexuality, Sodipo discusses safe art spaces and artistic symbolism as a means to extend conversation and spend more time together with artwork.

Hi Ebum, could you present yourself for our readers?

The most important things to know about me are that I am an artist and writer. Here are some less important things about me, in no particular order: I am a green fingered lover of anime and period dramas sets in imperial courts; I am a tall black trans woman living by the sea, enjoying the distance from the heart of an empire; I am Yoruba; a migrant with dual nationality; I consider myself a black abolitionist; I was raised in a middle class pentecostal Christian Nigerian household; I could stare at the sea for hours on end; I'm single, and I've had chicken pox twice.

Growing up did you always know you wanted to be an artist?

Not quite. My parents are both accountants, and in true post colonial middle class fashion wished for their children to go into STEM. They weren't into the arts either and didn't really have any friends who were creative. It wasn't until I was 16 or 17 that the desire for this path arose. I was quite good at drawing and painting and my art teachers at school persuaded me into doing an Art GCSE, and then an A-Level. After that it simply made sense for me, it felt like the best way to articulate myself.

I was always interested in storytelling from a very young age though. I devoured books from a very young age and started writing a novel when I was 9. I read constantly: in classes, on the bus on the way home (sometimes I'd be so engrossed in a book that I'd stay on the bus till its last stop hours from home). My parents tried, unsuccessfully, to confine my reading to the evenings, but obviously that didn't work. I think of my practice as storytelling, in different forms. There is always a narrative present in and between my works. Developing an artistic practice is in many ways simply learning different modes of

Your work depicts such a broad range of beautifully constructed, multi-disciplinary focuses. How do you come up with your varied projects?

I usually go with my body. So many of the things I've made were responses to things I was reading, watching, seeing. I might write something down somewhere and return to it in order to pull out ideas. Or an image forms and I flesh that out, seeing what is possible and realisable right now, and what will remain a dream, like what budget do I have, what's the best way to display it. Sometimes I isolate particular ideas, conduct some research and then build a performance, film or text around them. If its a text then, how should it be put out into the world: via sounding, or reading? If reading, a book, a website, a leaflet? Which form best guides the audience along the narrative I'm forming, which medium best lends itself to the affective terrain I want to explore? There are core ideas I have that ripple across different works, embedding themselves without my knowledge.

A lot of your work touches on themes surrounding race, sexuality and gender. How have your own personal experiences influenced the outcome of your work?

My experiences have led me to seek and answer questions, for example: what are black gestures; what is the place of imagination in self-fashioning; where do I begin and where do I end; how can you communicate the simultaneity of trauma and joy, the history that hurts and heals? Most of my works attempt to answer these questions, with long meandering answers, a drawing out and dwelling in the sensations of answering, using bodily sensations to take my audience somewhere: the feeling of being in the black mass, or an encounter with an image that sparks gender euphoria and realisation.

My work is motivated by a desire to give to others, particularly Black trans kids, what I didn't have growing up. This is why I try to speak about trans desire using black images, writing about the sensations of having little history. I make work for others to have and build on, answer questions others will no doubt ask, tell stories that haven't yet been told, construct a past that acts as a mirror for black trans people.

You tend to depict striking and evocative visuals that communicate these themes in a way that isn't always so literal. How did you get into this symbolic visual exploration?

In part the world taught me this. Like how so much of visual culture - i.e. images, films, adverts - subliminally communicate ideas about good and bad, the right type of people and life, and the bad kind: a brightly lit suburbia vs a dark and orange toned ghetto; lighting with a silky texture and the most pleasant of sounds when a muscular able bodied white man comes into frame makes us know him as attractive; unthinking, uncaring bad lighting transform a black man into a monstrous hulking shadow; multi hued lighting that reflects off sheening dark skin triggering erotic and nonerotic hunger. For me, film and video can be spaces to resist these techniques, to construct new ways of being impacted by seeing and listening, to upend ways of connecting with the world: can a disharmonious staccato burst of images and sound feel tender and calming?

Some of your projects include set designs such as The Black House, where you create warm familiar spaces that engage with those who visit. What encourages you to create these types of spaces?

I wanted really to replicate the space I'd found myself in as I leaned into my blackness and queerness. Myself, Heidi Sincuba, and Kefloe Siwisa wanted very much to counteract the emotions and thoughts that can arrive in one's body in mostly white spaces. I had just finished university and was still recovering from the pervasive whiteness and anti-blackness of that space, grappling with the gentrification I could see happening where I lived in Camberwell, and in Elephant and Castle, in Brixton, a pushing out of poor black folk. We knew that so many spaces made by black people had been closed down so we wanted to mitigate that in some way, build and work towards a permanent space that held black creativity, aided respite, laughter and joy, healing, learning.

Over the past few months, we've been in and out of lockdown. How did this affect the way you work?

The pandemic really slowed things down for me. I was blessed to have a hospitality job at the time of the initial lockdown so I was furloughed. This gave me the opportunity to focus almost solely on my creative practice. I started revisiting and reworking old work, taking things apart and pulling out the golden kernels. I thought and experimented with my moving image work, trying to bring a heavier trace of my presence. I wrote a lot: more poetry, essays, fiction (which I hadn't done since my fanfiction days more than a decade ago), and it's upped my confidence there... I'm far more playful with text and language than ever before. I think I was also able to look more at other people's work, and speak to people (so many Zooms!) which developed my own visual practice.

A lot of your work focuses on the much-needed representation of the LGBTQ+ community. What are you looking forward to the most in the art industry as a queer artist?

I'm looking forward to the art industry being made more accessible, and to new networks that prioritise marginalised people. And perhaps less engagement with established institutions in favour of newer, small collectives and individuals. There are so many questions in need of answering like, how do you make an art career a realistic and sustainable option for young people from non-white, working class backgrounds?

You've displayed an amazing array of projects thus far, so what can we look forward to from you in the future?

I just started a series of performance works titled my body reminds us of water, that have taken place at different venues around the UK, at small and major institutions: Kings College, Porthmeor Studios in St Ives, Frieze, Camden Arts Center in November. There are a couple more iterations coming up: Oxford in December and at Auto Italia. These performances think through image culture, desire production, the body as an archive, gender as ancestral communication. I've started work on a large scale project called Following The Gourd, which thinks through astronomical knowledge, cosmologies, archival practices, and will have multiple outcomes and realisations. One of these is a web based interactive map of a fictional night sky that also doubles as an archive of trans existence, created with a small group of Black Trans youth, with FACT Liverpool and VISUAL Carlow, in Ireland. I'm also writing a small collection of poetry to come out in 2022.
